

Disseminating new call for papers for a thematic issue on “Dialogues in the field of Food Anthropology”

We begin this editorial by wishing everyone a good reading and by thanking readers and authors for their support on the advancement and dissemination of our publishing.

The increasingly upcoming volume of original papers remains consistent. Thus, we were able to publish 15 high-standard original articles in this issue, along with five abstracts of theses and dissertations defended in the Graduate Programs in Food, Nutrition and Health from the Nutrition Institute of UERJ (State University of Rio de Janeiro). These papers addressed objects that identify the field of Food and Nutrition in Brazil, namely: food, nutriment and / or nutrient.

The original articles scaffold issues arising from several areas of knowledge that make up the scientific field of Food and Nutrition. For instance, one of the studies refers to the social identity of obese individuals; another study regards Policies on Food and Nutrition; two epidemiological studies address Nutrition; two studies on food production, another study on food chemical composition and microbiological quality; and, for last, eight studies that concern Clinical Nutrition.

Maintaining the growth trajectory of Demetra is key to our editorial policy. In a previous opportunity, we successfully invested in the dissemination of research articulating knowledge and practices on Food and Humanities. By following this thread, we would like to announce our next investment: the creation of a special issue that will focus on the discussion on food knowledge and practice that have as core theme dialogues in Food Anthropology.

In this new thematic issue, to be published in 2015, we aim to create opportunities for the dissemination of research and reflections that address studies on the significant social and cultural arrangements of various human groupings, depicted from the analysis of their eating habits. We are extremely excited and encouraged with great expectations to announce and acknowledge our partnership with researchers Martín César Tempass, from the Universidade Federal de Pelotas, and Mônica Chaves Abdala, from the Universidade Federal de Uberlândia, in coordinating this promising thematic issue.

We hope that this new thematic issue will contribute to a greater dialogue between the Human and Social Sciences and the Health Sciences in Food and Nutrition research. Thus, we invite nutritionists, anthropologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists, and other professionals, to discuss such matter that requires multidisciplinary perspectives.

We hope, once again, that researchers will reliably submit their work for publication and continue to collaborate and strengthen our publishing, which is committed to providing free and public access opportunity to scientific knowledge.
