The Journal of City Law, indexed in Web of Science and Google Scholar with median H5 of 16.0, of quarterly periodicity, in this volume 15, number 01, 2023, is pleased to inform that the article "PEREIRA, Jane Reis, Popular initiative in Brazilian constitutional system: theoretical background, configuration and proposals for change. Revista de Direito da Cidade, v. 8, n. 4, p. 1707-1756, oct./dez. 2016, p. 1730-1731" was cited in the decision of the DIRECT UNCONSTITUTIONALITY ACTION (ADIN) 825 AMAPÁ, filed in the Supreme Court - STF, reported by Minister Alexandre de Moraes.

The Journal is also pleased to publish the article "Crisis management and public policies. The trend towards regulatory practices in some countries" by Benjamín José Méndez Bahena, Professor at the National Polytechnic Institute, Mexico, Pablo Armando Cruz Hernández, Research Assistant in the Department of International Studies at the Autonomous Metropolitan University (UAM), Cuajimalpa Unit, Mexico. PhD in Social Sciences and Humanities and of Jorge Enrique Culebro Moreno, Full-time Professor C in the Department of International Studies at UAM-Cuajimalpa, Mexico.

The article "Crisis management and public policies. The trend toward regulatory practices in some countries" aims to investigate whether governments tend to implement regulatory policies in response to the Covid-19 pandemic and to examine the type of citizen response to different types of policies. Given that active and collaborative citizen participation is an essential element for proper crisis management, citizen resistance, active opposition and demonstrations in public spaces are detrimental to the success of government policies in the face of a crisis. Theoretical perspectives of crisis management and institutional analysis were employed, as well as qualitative case study methods and comparative studies. Different types of policies implemented in different countries were analyzed. The analysis shows that there is indeed a tendency to implement regulatory policies. It also identifies that where regulatory policies are created and implemented without taking into account contextual aspects, they usually catalyze citizen discomfort. Therefore, it is argued that the type of policy used is relevant in deciding what the responses of governments should be and its effect on legitimacy during crises.

As in previous issues, in the current volume 15, number 01, 2023, we are publishing 16 (sixteen) unpublished articles, of which 5 (five) are foreign articles: the already mentioned "Crisis management and public policies. The trend towards regulatory practices in some countries" by Benjamín José Méndez Bahena, Professor of the National Polytechnic Institute, Mexico, and Pablo Armando Cruz Hernández, Research Assistant in the International Studies Department of
